Thebe Ntshelang, managing director of Thebe-Ya-Setshaba Investment Holdings, in Uptington in the Northern Cape.

Putting waste to work

By Zolile Mkhazoe

Old, worn-out and disused motor vehicle tyres can become a potential hazard to the environment but one man, Thebe Ntshelang, is taking care to avoid a catastrophe to our living world.

His business, Thebe-Ya-Setshaba Investment Holdings, has interests in various fields, with the flagship subsidiary specialising in wastemanagement.

Based in Uptington in the Northern Cape, Ntshelang, 26, found himself surrounded by mining activity and its by-products, including disused tyres, in the mining areas of Kathu and Kuruman where he grew up.

"The local municipal landfill site was also flooded with them, so with that in mind, me and a business associate, Tumo Janjie, started doing research around waste tyres in SA."

They later learnt a tyre plan was in its final stages of being approved by the Department of Environmental Affairs, spearheaded by an organisation called The Recycling and Economic Development Initiative of South Africa (Redisa). "The success of our operations can really be attributed to the constant guidance and mentorship we have received from Redisa."
